Rolling Papers Conflict

In a surprising twist of retail strategy, a division of convenience stores has decided to stop carrying rolling papers in certain areas. It seems they're rolling out a new policy, perhaps to keep things fresh—or maybe they're just trying to weed out less popular items. While some may find this move a bit unfiltered, it's clear that the store is trying to wrap up any concerns about their product lineup. Whether this will light up sales or just smoke out customers remains to be seen, but it's certainly sparked a conversation about the diverse inventory of convenience stores. If you're looking for rolling papers and your local spot has extinguished their supply, you might have to roll on to the next store—or perhaps consider a dispensary or smoke shop.
